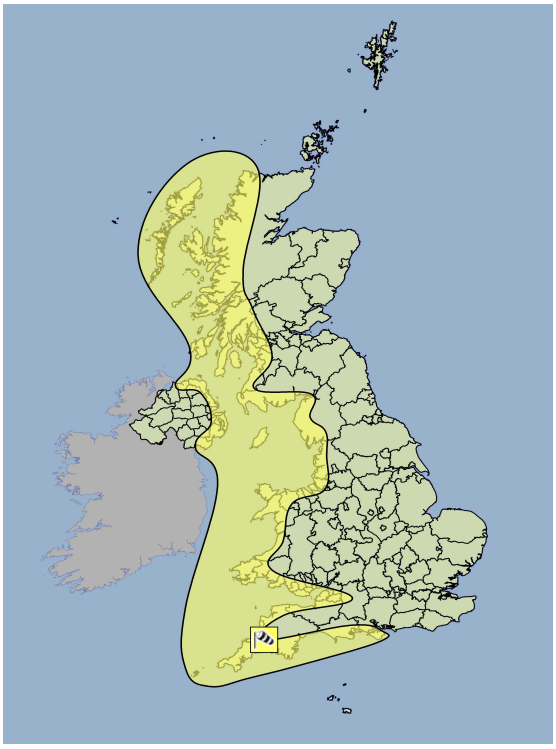
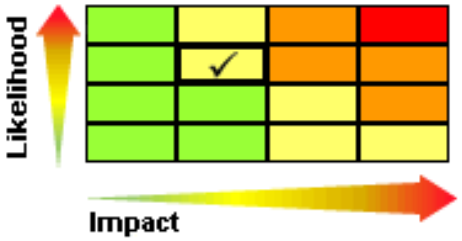
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A large, deep depression in the Atlantic is whipping waves up out at sea on Sunday, these coming into western and southern coastal areas of the UK as a large swell on Monday. This, combined with waves driven by the winds in UK waters on Monday will generate wave heights of 7-10 metres over parts of western Scotland, Wales and southwest England, and 3-7 metres in much of the English Channel and Irish Sea. Whilst tides are past their peak of last week, they will still be high, and there remains a risk of coastal flooding.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Wind

Valid from 03:00 on Mon, 06th Jan 2014 until 23:55 on Mon, 06th Jan 2014

Strong winds will combine with large waves to bring the risk of coastal flooding. Winds will gust to 60 MPH or so on coasts, and locally to 70 MPH, but waves will be larger than usually associated with this strength. The public should be aware of the dangers of waves crashing onshore and over topping shore lines and sea fronts.
